"How will we cross this one?" asked the Tang Monk. A small canoe came into view. A man paddled it toward the travelers. As the man paddled, he stared at the Tang Monk.

"Greetings!" called the man as he came closer. "Do you all need a ride across the river?" "Yes," said the Tang Monk. "We were just wondering how we would get across. We're going to the West to get scriptures from Buddha."

"You must be the Tang Monk!" said the man brightly. "I've heard you would pass through this area eventually." "Really?" asked the Tang Monk. "Yes," said the man with a smile. "You're famous." He glanced down at his canoe. "I would be happy to take you all across. But as you can see, my canoe is not very big. I can take only two passengers at a time."

As the man talked, Wukong watched him carefully. Something about the man didn't look quite right. The monkey was about to say something when Bajie stepped forward.

"The Tang Monk and I will go first," said the pig. Wukong hesitated. "Master, I don't think this is a good idea."

The Tang Monk frowned. "You never trust people, Wukong. This kind man is willing to help us cross the river." The monkey bit his lip as the monk and Bajie climbed into the canoe. They sat down, and the man paddled away from shore.

Wukong watched the canoe glide across the river. When it was about halfway across, Wukong noticed something.

"Am I imagining things, or is the canoe sinking?" asked the monkey. Wujing looked. "You're not imagining things," he said. "It is sinking!"

The two of them watched as the canoe slipped under the surface of the water. Wukong stamped his foot. "That man kidnapped Master and Bajie! I knew he looked suspicious!"
